Orange Restricted

Foreword

“Sudden Dreams”, written and composed specially for Orange by Sophie Hunger, has been the brand’s sound trademark since August 2013. We have just renewed our contract with Sophie Hunger through August 22, 2019.

Several different versions/arrangements of this track have been produced, to satisfy our affiliates’ and departments’ diverse needs.

Orange is the music publisher for “Sudden Dreams” and the producer for all its versions. Orange has acquired the right to use this track in all its forms.

The purpose of these guidelines is to summarize the rules that apply to the use of this song. These rules must be carefully followed, in accordance with the contract signed by Orange. This contract includes certain obligations with regards to Sophie Hunger.

The agencies we work with must understand that these rules are compulsory.

The musical work and the phonogram

The rights holders of a musical work

Before even being recorded, a musical work is:

- Lyrics, words => an author or songwriter
- A music score, notes => a composer

The rights holders for this musical work are:

- The songwriter
- The composer
- The publisher or publishers

The songwriter and composer are commonly known as the authors of the work. The publisher is chosen by the songwriter/composer. The publisher's mission is to defend and manage these rights, and to find exploitation deals for the work.

The songwriter and the composer often have their own individual publisher.

The musical work and the phonogram

The rights holders of a phonogram

Once recorded, the musical work becomes a phonogram or master

- A master is the recording of one interpretation of the musical work by a particular performer (individual artist or group).
- There can be many different interpretations of a single work, and therefore just as many masters.

The rights holders for this master are:

- The performer (individual artist or group)
- The producer

The producer is responsible for the recording, carried out at his initiative (in practice, this means he finances the recording).

The musical work and the phonogram

Using a musical work

- It is “indivisible”, meaning that the use of a segment of the work legally implies use of the full work
- It is “non-transferable”, meaning that the authors remain the same, no matter which interpretation, recording or version is being used
- In order for the SACEM to properly identify and distribute royalties to rights holders, the work must be registered and individually identified

This is the cornerstone of the model we’ve defined for our sound identity.

Rights management

Rights management
Authors' royalties

The SACEM is the collection society for authors' royalties in France. Its members are songwriters/composers and music publishers. The SACEM collects royalties from broadcasters (media, performance venues, digital platforms, retail…) and allocates these sums to the authors/publishers according to the statements provided by the various users

By joining the SACEM, an author automatically transfers his reproduction and representation rights to the collection society. From then on, only the SACEM can authorise use of his works. He can no longer prevent the use of his creations (except for violation of his moral rights)

In order for royalties to be efficiently allocated, the authors must register their works with the SACEM. They receive an identification number that all broadcasters and distributors must indicate whenever they make use of the work (irrespective of format)

Certain rights remain under the responsibility of the publisher, who manages them on behalf of the author. The most important ones are reproduction rights for lyrics and scores, and music licensing for advertising

Rights management

Music licensing for advertising is a special case

- The advertiser must get the work's publisher to approve the association of a retail brand with the music. Whoever produced the master also must approve this association. The publisher takes care of getting authorisation from the authors
- The advertiser pays a flat fee to each right holder
- Whenever an advertisement is aired, this generates public performance rights proportional to the overall use. The media pay these rights to the SACEM, for distribution among authors and publishers.
- These rights represent a significant source of income for rights holders

Rights management
Usage: the financial streams

Broadcasters
Television channels, radio stations, cinemas, concerts, retail, IVRs...

- Mechanical reproduction rights
- Public performance rights

Outside of France

- Songwriter
- Composer
- Arranger
- Publishers

 When television channels air advertising, public performance rights represent 75% of the total royalties they pay the Sacem. Mechanical reproduction rights represent approximately 25%.

What is a musical arrangement?

- An arrangement is a modification of the musical work, such as a change in rhythm, melody or instruments.
- Recording an arrangement requires upfront permission from the songwriter/ composer of the original work.
- The new arrangement of the work must be registered separately with the SACEM. The arranger (who is a SACEM member) becomes a rights holder.
- The arranger's compensation is determined in part by SACEM statutes and in part by an agreement negotiated with the authors. The arranger's compensation is taken from the songwriter/composer royalties.
  - Public performance rights – statutory:
    4/12 for songwriter (of which 1/12 are for the arranger)
    4/12 for composer (of which 1/12 are for the arranger)
    4/12 for publisher
  - Mechanical reproduction rights – negotiated:
    25% for songwriter (5% are generally given to the arranger)
    25% for composer (5% are generally given to the arranger)
    50% for publisher

Orange sound identity
The Orange sonic logo

- The sound trademark = an excerpt of “Sudden Dreams” = “Sudden Dreams” in its entirety, from a legal perspective
- We have created several sound trademarks, based on the original version. And we can create more if we want
- This is the case for each new arrangement
- To be most efficient in the use our sound identity, we must be rigorous in registering our music for each of our advertising campaigns

Orange sound identity

The Orange sonic logo

- The sound signature of Orange consists of the 7 notes of the sonic logo and the word “Orange”.
- It can also include the baseline « It’s all about what matters to you » before the word “Orange”.

Orange sound identity

Voice, tone, intonation, language

- Voice is an integral part of a brand's sound identity.
- As such, it must respect its personality. For Orange, it must therefore be: simple, close to, positive and bold.
- The voice is an adult voice because it must convey confidence and serenity. There is an obviousness in the tone without falling into any kind of arrogance or self-sufficiency.
- The tone is natural, kind, smiling and sincere: a tone very close to usual conversations. Thus, it is necessarily a human voice and not a synthetic voice.
- The baseline « It's all about what matters to you » can be pronounced indifferently by the voice-off of the spot or by the voice of the signature.
- The choice of the language(s) is free depending on the country.

Orange sound identity
The rules of usage of the sonic logo

For TV

- It consists of 7 musical notes + the pronunciation of the word “Orange”, within a space of 3 seconds.
- It is always placed at the end of a commercial, when our brand signature and logo appear. For all advertisements, the visual and sound signatures are the last thing the viewer should hear and see on the screen.
- Ideally, a half-second of silence should be placed before the sound trademark

For radio

- Depending on local usage and the affiliate’s habits, the sound trademark can open or close a radio ad. When it closes the ad, ideally, a half-second of silence should be placed before the sound trademark. This full song can also systematically be used for radio advertising syncs (i.e. Orange France).

Orange sound identity
What you can’t do with the sonic logo

- Add other elements into the sound trademark, such as music, sounds, sound design…
- Change the sound signature
- Use Orange’s sound trademark with those of other brands
- Create ringtones or other formats based on our sound signature
- Be in breach of the users’ guidelines

Orange sound identity
Registering the music

In order for Orange Editions to receive its royalties, every sync use of our sound trademark or brand theme (the song “Sudden Dreams”) in an advertisement must be declared to the broadcast media (cue sheet).

All our formats must always identify the references of the musical work included, as follows:

Title	Sudden Dreams
Songwriter	Sophie Hunger
Composer	Sophie Hunger
Publisher	Orange Editions
Registration number of the work	(SACEM identification number, depending on the chosen arrangement)

Recommendations and formalities

- It takes at least 3 years of conscientious use for a sound trademark to make its mark on the public
- In order to successfully avoid a burnout effect, manage sonic logo use over time. It depends on the amount of advertising campaigns per year. In France, for example, we recommend, for the first 2-3 years, to use one same version, to facilitate memorisation and brand identification. Then, alternate between different versions of the sonic logo
- The sound trademark helps identify the Brand. It should be used extensively. On the other hand, the full versions of “Sudden Dreams” should be used sparingly. If these long versions are used too often, the public may tire of them
- All uses of “Sudden Dreams” must be traceable. Any advertising campaign that makes use of the whole or an excerpt of this work (the sound trademark being an excerpt of the work) is required to provide the work’s references (credits and SACEM identification number – cf. slides 23-24-25-26)
- Even if the work isn’t identifiable, the SACEM still invoices the broadcaster (who has to pay no matter what). However, the SACEM will be unable to pay out the royalties due to Orange Editions
